

Jury Duty: A System of Justice

By Chaitanya Govind

There are a lot of important elements in a community. I could blather on about each and every one of them, but that would be rather boring and time-consuming. So, I'm going to focus on one of the greatest justice systems of all time: jury duty. Jury duty is brilliant; it brings a large variety of people together to give their opinions on a court case. Each and every person differs, so they all bring something to the table. Jury duty is incredibly important, and it's a great way to implement justice in several parts of the globe.

The jury often contains a diverse group of jurors; each one differs from the rest. Every juror has different strengths and weaknesses; when combined, they can create amazing ideas, and come up with clever solutions. Every opinion and idea is taken into account of and transformed into one final decision: guilty or not guilty. The diversity in the group is what makes it so brilliant, as it means that more than one mind can decide what happens.

In a jury, everyone is treated equally; no one is left in the corner. They vote on ideas to decide whether the person on trial is innocent or not. No one's opinion is left behind. It's especially important for them to cooperate; without working together, they won't accomplish anything. Even though everyone on a jury is different, they can come together to find a conclusion. The jury is a place where every opinion is respected and important.

Justice is a crucial part of life; without it, there would be no law, simply chaos. The jury's main duty is to decide whether or not the defendant is guilty, or responsible for whatever the plaintiff is accusing them off. A juror has justice on their side, helping them determine who's innocent and who isn't. Jurors are brave people; they hold the defendant's fate on their shoulders.

Though jury duty isn't that fun, it's a very beneficial and effective system to implement justice in many communities. Jurors take part in a noble and just process that brings people together in the name of the law. The jury is an incredible system which should be respected and supported by all.
